Richards' theory states that words are symbolic and do not have precise definitions; rather, the meaning of words is determined by the context in which the word is used. According to Richards, context refers not only to the current situation, but also to a speaker's lifetime of experiences. Richards uses the semantic triangle to illustrate his belief that there is a direct causal relationship between a thought and a symbol and a thought referent; however, the path between symbol and referent is ambiguous. The lack of a clear connection between symbol and referent causes misunderstanding to arise if communicators do not share the same meaning of words. Richards proposes four remedies to alleviate such misunderstanding: defining words, using metaphors, anticipating the effect of words, and the use of simple words.

Richards' claim that words are inherently meaningless implies that communication is fallible. In other words, speakers can never be sure that their messages are accurately conveyed because of their different experiences. Further, Richards implies that we all go into interactions blindly because the meaning of words is context driven. The context-driven nature of words makes intercultural communication particularly impossible because of the lack of shared experiences between communicators. In turn, Richards' theory implies that the only people who are effective communicators are those who have shared experiences with their audience, can identify with their audience by taking their listeners' perspective, or take the time to name things in the environment together with their audience.
